Many women in third world countries struggle with health problems. The cause of these health problems is from a number of issues that range from sanitary problems to social problems within the community that the women live. Many third world countries lack the education of many health and disease issues. Even if they were educated they would probably not have the economic income to buy supplies in order to manage the health issues. One way to solve the lack of income would be to educate the communities and supply them with a way to trade with other countries, therefore providing them with more revenue. Many third world communities live where there is not adequate infrastructure to reach them and provide them with supplies or medical help. If they could afford this medical assistance, roads would need to be built in order to reach the communities and transport supplies to them. These infrastructures require money and development, which many communities cannot afford. The underlying theme that was portrayed in the article that I read was that in order to help with the health of the third world communities we must figure out a way for them to bring in revenue to the communities.
